The Trout Caught the Diamond.

This is the way the latest fish story is told hereabouts: Joseph S. Frey and William Bercaw were trout fishing up in Monroe county on Saturday. While forcing his way through a thick clump of bushes overhanging the stream Bercaw saw a good sized trout dart out from a bank of the creek and pass directly beneath him. Working his way to a secluded nook a few feet above, the anxious angler cast his fly with such skill that in a few seconds he caught and safely landed a speckled beauty about ten inches in length. He made a second effort, but could get no more trout there.

Well, the fishermen continued on their way until their sport had ended and they seated themselves to clean their fish, of which, of course, they had a fine lot. On opening one of the tront the fish was found to contain a diamond shirt stud. This caused Bercaw to look for his diamond, when it was found to be missing. Then it flashed to the fisherman's mind how fortunate he had been-that in passing through the brush his diamond had been forced from his shirt front; the trout he had seen dart in front of him had swallowed the jewel, and then he had succeeded in capturing the fish.

To a reporter who inquired of Mr. Bercaw concerning the truthfulness of the story, the latter declared it to be a fact in every particular.—Easton (Pa.)

Two Moons in the Washington Sky. About 1 o'clock one morning recently a beautiful spectacle was presented in the northwestern sky. The moon was about 20 degs, above the horizon, and the air was so surcharged with moisture that a halo, with an apparent diameter of eighty feet, was formed. In some parts this halo was rather indistinct, but on the right hand of the moon, as one looked toward the south, the halo at one point gradually increased in brilliancy until there was a perfect mirage of the moon. The phenomenon continued for several minutes and then faded away. An observer thought that the best designation of it would be "moon dog," as it resembled the phenomenon which is pro-

"You know," he continued, "that there has been a good deal of mystery about the pocket in a woman's dress. It has been discussed, and every funny man in the newspaper business has taken a shot at it. The Effect of a Surprise. "I'll take vichy and lemon."

The speaker was a young and lovely girl; her blue gray eyes peeped out from under a tangled mass of brown hair by her side. They had entered a Fulton | cent Cough Cure, and I can safely street drug store in search of some liquid | recommend it as the best cough remedy refreshment, and the young man had asked his fair companion the question usual on such occasions, in something like the following words: "Well, Floss, what are you going to drink?" The coy girl answered the question in the words with which this story opens.

The athletic young man turned pale. He had spent every one of his twentyeight summers in Brooklyn and had had a different girl each season from the time he was fourteen years of age, and had spent many cold, hard earned dollars in drug stores and ice cream dens or "parlors," as they are called in Brooklyn. Every one of these girls had invariably replied to the query of "What are you going to drink?" with the stereotyped Brooklyn giri" reply of "I guess I'll take vanilla cream.' Consequently, when this latest flame of his broke the record by calling for the extraordinary decoction of "vichy and lemon," the surprise was too much; he gasped, reeled and fell senseless to the floor. He was taken home, and it is thought that by careful nursing he will be able to be out again in a month or so. Assumpsit. -Brooklyn Eagle.

The Cycling Girl.

However little she may realize it, every girl who rides her steel horse is a vivid illustration of one of the greatest waves of progress of this century, the advancement of women in freedom and opportunity. Here, as well as every-where else, she is a little belated in claiming her rights; only a little, for it is but twenty-one years since the bicycle, as we know it, was invented, while the safety styles, which women affect, are very recent improvements.
